

Socialization: The cure for isolation

Empathy, Safety, Support, Hands-on Care

A happy family knows their loved one is receiving the needed care and they are free to be a loving family.

Families often feel the need to care for the aging adult in their own homes. Although this is noble and commendable, it is not always what is best for the loved one or the family. The family is often not equipped to handle the care needs of the loved one. This can cause a decline that can be quite disturbing to all. The loved one frequently resents being directed by a family member when they came from that position of leadership in the past. This brings real clarity to their loss of independence. Most important, often this leads to isolation and loneliness. Although they may be resistant to the transition of moving from their home; moving offers them professional care, socialization, and the opportunity to enjoy the time they spend with their family. It also allows them as much independence as they can manage.
